

Flexible and Remote Working Policy

Hybrid working, location flexibility and temporary working arrangements

1. Hybrid and home working

Most roles that can be performed away from the office are eligible for a hybrid working arrangement, agreed individually between an employee and their manager based on the needs of the role and the team. How many days are typically spent working from home versus the office varies by team and is set locally with the manager, rather than following a single fixed company-wide rule.

2. Working from another UK location

Employees may occasionally work from a different UK location, for example while visiting family, provided they let their manager know in advance and can maintain a secure, reliable connection for their work. This is intended for occasional or short periods rather than a permanent change of work location. Business travel arranged for work purposes is a separate matter and follows the Expenses and Business Travel policy.

3. Flexible start and finish times

Where the role allows it, an employee may agree a flexible start and finish time with their manager, for example starting earlier to avoid rush hour, or finishing early on a particular day, provided core team meeting times are still covered and the total agreed hours are worked across the week. This is arranged locally with the manager rather than through a formal company-wide scheme.

4. Company equipment away from the office

Company laptops and other issued equipment may be used at home, at another UK location, or while travelling, provided the same security practices apply as in the office - the device should not be left unattended in a public place, and screens should be locked when stepping away. Any fault, loss, or theft is reported in exactly the same way described in the IT Support and Security policy, regardless of where it happens.

5. Overseas remote work

Working from outside the UK, even temporarily, requires manager approval in advance and may involve additional checks around tax, right-to-work, and data protection depending on the country and how long the employee plans to be there. Each request is considered on a case-by-case basis rather than being automatic, and employees should raise a request well before any planned travel so these checks can be completed in time.
